LECTURE SERIES

Intersectionality is a key perspective for the understanding of contemporary cultural and social analyses/studies. However, since the first elaborations on intersectional discrimination by Kimberlé Crenshaw (1991), the term has generated a wide array of exceptions and approaches, depending on local and disciplinary perspectives. Intersectionality does not necessarily mean the same thing, nor include the same categories, in Kyiv as in Caracas.

Drawing on a broad spectrum of literary studies, humanities, social sciences, and gender studies, among others, our lecture series offers a comprehensive understanding of different perspectives on intersectionality in the Americas. By emphasizing the importance of different loci of enunciation, it seeks to foster a nuanced dialogue that respects and acknowledges different points of view.

Through a variety of presentations by international scholars, artists and activists, the lecture series aims to delve into different visions of intersectionality by embracing intercultural dialogue and shedding light on inequalities, forms of discrimination, and challenges facing the region today. The series invites participants to engage in conversations, discussions, and explorations of intersectionality within the lens of Area Studies, with a focus on Spanish and Portuguese-speaking regions, particularly Latin America.

Overall, the lecture series aims to raise awareness among students, scholars, and the public, in order to develop a critical understanding of identity constructions and historical inequalities. Committed to the critical analysis of intersectionality and Area Studies, the initiative continues to provide an open space for transcultural dialogue.

WORKSHOP

This workshop will serve as preparation and as a complement to the lecture series of the same name. In this workshop, we will have the space to start discussing what we understand by intersectionality, integrating different points of view, theoretical visions and practical cases relevant to the Latin American, Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking regions.

The aim is to open a dialogue on intersectionality from an intercultural perspective and to provide participants with a panoramic introduction, in line with the purpose of the lecture series. Through the reading and discussion of texts and short presentations, participants will have the opportunity to begin the analysis around a critical understanding of the historical inequalities experienced in the region as well as its future challenges.

Participation in both the lecture AND the workshop is required for the awarding of ECTS!
